I love the sector. And the CEO of XPO is the real deal.

I know but I just personally know nada about them. I think selling puts and collecting premium on all 3 would make sense for him. He really is not in that industry at all.

Paul,

Please see attached 1-pager published two weeks ago (and also a more detailed report on the industry). Our analyst is really bullish on FEDEX and XPO and doesn't like UPS which really got beat up last few weeks.

What I think makes sense is picking up premium on puts on these two stocks that you should be long if they dip lower from current levels. You get $4.50 for $220 June Fedex Puts (the stock now at $242 and still 10% down to January highs).

When it comes to XPO, you can get $2.45 for May 90 Puts (we have a $133 target on that stock and I recently sat in a meeting with our analyst and he clearly is very bullish this company).

My point is, you have nothing in logistics and you could be long a more defensive industry if you get exercised on stocks that have really good growth stories.

On UPS – they really got beat lately, but they are way behind in capex investments compared to where Fedex is and their automation levels are 20 years behind Fedex now. Could be a punt, but not sure it makes sense trying to catch a falling knife on a story that is not attractive.

Martin
